Los Alamos Place Names Craig Martin

In the last months of World War II, the components of the device that would be detonated at Trinity Site were assembled in the Ice House next to Ashley Pond, where the Los Alamos Ranch School staff had cut huge blocks of ice in winter to store in the nearby stone building. Though the original building is gone, a memorial stands in its place and represents just one of many historic place names in Los Alamos. Together with the names of modern manmade structures and natural formations, the place names fill this book. The details of how the names came about are sometimes obvious, sometimes not so obvious. Some of the stories behind the names are funny, and some are poignant. Whether named for people, events, plants, or animals, all of the entries are interesting.
